ON CALL IN AFRICA in War and Peace – 1910 to 1932

Hardback print edition available April 2016 from Gillyflower Publishing and from the website www.oncallinafrica.com

An absolutely fascinating memoir of a doctor's life in Africa and an evocative and wholly authentic account of the East African campaign, 1914-18, a forgotten corner of the Great War.

William Boyd, author of An Ice-Cream War

This was no ordinary campaign. Combatants who had previously served in France wished themselves back in the trenches... I am especially impressed to see that the long-buried Pike Reports on Medical and Sanitary Matters in German and British East Africa, completed in 1918, have been extensively referenced.

Edward Paice, author of Tip and Run

Jewell's diaries have a distinctive voice infused with intelligence, deep wisdom, compassion, and integrity. There are so many examples of his personal bravery but they are not highlighted or presented in that way. It is easy to read on, without pausing, past the modest and matter-of-fact descriptions that he gives. He was rightly awarded the Military Cross for treatment of 100 casualties single-handed without sleep. The fine granularity of the account captivates in a way that a military historical analysis will not always do.

Sir Liam Donaldson, Chief Medical Officer for England, 1998-2010

Norman Jewell's memoir gives us the best eye-witness account of medical conditions among the troops fighting in East Africa that we have had so far. It is a riveting account of the horrors of warfare far removed from the Western Front trenches but existing in the heat, mud, flies and dust of Kenya and Tanganyika.

Christine Nicholls, author of Red Strangers: the White Tribes of Kenya

This book has wonderful photographs, and the Official Diary transcriptions have full National Archive citations. The Index of several hundred names is a boon to family historians; and a good Bibliography renders this a must-have book for the WWI East Africa enthusiast.

Ann Crichton- Harris, author of Seventeen Letters to Tatham

[The book] fills in many blank spaces to the East African Campaign and brings an interesting and different angle to the medical services in the colony at the height of the British Empire. The Jewell family has done a great service to the memory of these interesting times and the people that lived through them.

James Willson, author of Guerrillas of Tsavo

Jewell's depiction of the contingencies and missteps, the happenstance and fortunes of wartime medical practice are a real boon to the historian of global war in Africa.

Dr John Manton, London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine

Dr. Jewell states 'Africans had a natural aptitude for mechanics and Africans had their senses developed to a degree unknown to Europeans.' There are accounts of the Wandoboro tribe's ability to solve murder crimes, Nandi women nurses... and a Kikuyu who won every race from 100 yards to a marathon in a span of six hours.... this is a book worth reading to all those interested in an in-depth accurate account of life in Seychelles and East Africa for the period 1910 to 1932. The book would also be of interest to public health professionals, policy makers and students.

Professor George Karani, Africa Partnership Initiative, Cardiff Metropolitan University.

On Call in Africa tells the uncommon story of Norman P. Jewell, a medical graduate of Trinity College, Dublin. A colourful account by any measure, but as a member of the academic staff in Trinity's Chemistry School, I confess that it was the chapter on Norman's wife, Sydney Elise Auchinleck and Trinity's first female graduate in Chemistry, that captured my interest. The Auchinleck family embodied some of the complexities and contradictions of Irish identity... This was a time of immense change in Trinity's educational landscape and the account of Sydney's experience certainly made all the more real what previously I had understood in more abstract terms.

Dónall MacDonaill, Associate Professor, Chemistry Dept, Trinity College, Dublin.

...a dedicated family project that provides a fascinating source that will be of great use to historians, as well as the general reader, interested in the complex interrelationships of colonialism, medicine and war.

Anna Greenwood, co-author of Indian Doctors in Kenya, 1895-1940
